• In 1989, the Association of College and Research Libraries (a division of the American Library Association) Presidential Committee on Information Literacy stated that, “Ultimately, information literate people are those who have learned how to learn. They know how to learn because they know how knowledge is organized, how to find information, and how to use information in such a way that others can learn from them. They are people prepared for lifelong learning, because they can always find the information needed for any task or decision at hand.”

THE WORLD IN DRESS: Anthropological Perspectives on Clothing, Fashion, and Culture

Karen Tenberg Hansen
Department of Anthropology, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois 60208-3110. Email: karen.hansen@northwestern.edu

Key Words: dress, body, material culture, consumption, clothing practice, style, modernization.

Abstract. Clothing research has attracted renewed interest in anthropology over the past two decades, experiencing a resurgence that has been driven by theoretical paradigms in the social sciences and by a growing interest in the ways that clothing is used to express identity and power. The body, in particular, has emerged as a key concept in the study of clothing, with a focus on how clothing is used to negotiate identity and power in social interactions. This paper examines the role of clothing in shaping and reproducing social relations, with particular attention to the ways in which clothing is used to negotiate identity and power in social interactions. The paper concludes with a discussion of the implications of these findings for our understanding of the role of clothing in shaping and reproducing social relations.

INTRODUCTION

A rich literature on dress has appeared across the sciences and popular press in recent years. Active and creative engagements with apparel stand a cross disciplines into museums exhibitions where fashion is displayed as art. Several encyclopedias on clothing and fashion are forthcoming. The wealth of academic scholarship includes articles, monographs, and edited collections with regional or topical focus. Fashion theory, a new interdisciplinary journal, complements the scholarship of Costume, the journal of the Costume Society of America, and Dress, the journal of the Costume Society of America. Berg is publishing a new book series, Dress, Body, and Culture. Highly profiled international conferences on themes ranging from clothing and representations to fashion and consumption showcase firm scholarship. Anthropology contributes to this growing body of research by giving new life to the study of clothing, which for a long time received only passing attention.
Manufacturing Beauty, Grooming Selves: The Creation of Femininities in the Global Economy - An Introduction

Abstract

Recent decades have seen the rise of a global beauty industry, with profound effects on people’s body images, ideals of beauty, and beauty practices worldwide. In this special issue, we bring together original anthropographic contributions in order to explore an emerging field in social studies, showing how beauty practices involving the creation of beauty are deeply woven into the production of gendered bodies and social selves in the global economy. Following the focus on the relationship between physical beauty and femininity in the scholarship on beauty, this introduction will address the role of beauty and self-making in relation to the creation of femininity, especially in terms of subjectivities. While contemporary beauty regimes affect all genders, this introduction will argue that they do so in different ways.
